THE MIND AND HAPPINESS.

Two of the most remarkable and unexpected suicides of modern times have been committed by literary men, in the full blast of mental occupation. We allude to the extragreat contrast between the two men. The first was emphatically and eminently a religious man. In fact it was an over-earnest desire to vindicate what he considered some of the reconciling truths between the Book of Genesis and Geology that, finally, having overtasked his mental energies, drove him to that borror of great darkness which utterly dethroned his reason, and led him to that act which was without any outward cause, and abhorrent to all his most settled principles.

In the other case there were several outward circumstances to help to account for the Herbert speaks of himself as one of the most wretched of men, as being for twenty-six there is plenty of evidence to show that morfeats of mental labor, and now that utter re-laxation and want of nerve and faith to meet Teams:—One-fifth cash, and the residue at 3 1 literary life.

The two gentlemen whose names we have life by birth and early education-Hugh Miland the best education could bestow. Yet Mill, Page's Fatert, with all the fixtures for the here their situations were more apparently same. than really dissimilar, for Hugh Miller became distinguished on the stones of the field as Herbert on ancient learning, history, and those fashionable field sports in which the aristocracy of England delight.

But in other respects there was a strong similarity in these men, both in the circumstances of their lives and of their deaths .-Both were voluminous authors-not mere copyists and compilers of other men's ideas, but writers of original and strong thoughts, rapidly thrown off, but exhibiting the very highest qualities of vigorous mental force and imagination. Most of their works were what the farmers would call a scourging crop, exhaustive in the highest degree of the mind, and written with great energy and beauty of style. Both were men of an originally fine and manly constitution. We vividiy remember the remarkably well built and manly form of Henry W. Herbert, as he leaped from the box-seat of a stage-coach to present a letter of introduction to a near relative and friend. He was then about thirty, just about to be married to his first wife, a lady of the highest respectability and connexions, in high spirits, and with a manliness, frankness, and gentleness of address that, through its great simplicity and ease, would have won him entrauce any where. Both were singularly fond of playing with all sorts of deadly weapons, good shots with a pistol, and inclined to keep such dangerous tools close about them. Both had overworked themselves by excessive fits of writing, until a depression of spirits seems to have succeeded, bringing upon them a frenzy of desperation and despair. Both wrote letters showing that the act was in one sense premeditated, while both by em treatment. their last writings showed that intense present suffering robbed them of the sustaining sense of the future, without beclouding their intellectual consciousness of it. And both, at about the same hour in the night, and almost precisely the same way, terminated

The occasions of most apparent causes for such acts are not always the most real causes. Other things may have operated and did operate beyond doubt in this last case; but the utter exhaustion arrising from over mental effort in imaginary and intellectual efforte, leaving the will too powerless and exhausted to contend with the difficulties of simple existence in real life, was one great cause lying at the bottom of both acts. It was the only cause in Hugh Miller's case.

The literary man lives in an ideal worlda most unnatural life. Give him his garret, his inkstand, and his book, and he has a world within bimself, a world of delight in which he can escape all calamity for the time being. But, when utterly exhausted with this life, he awakes to the body, and finds trouble on every side from little neglects, or whims, or errors. His mental power being all exhausted, he readily sinks into despair. His faith in every thing, except some one present and pressing, sometimes quite imaginary, is gone.

In Hugh Miller's case, it might be said. bauted, and sported, and taken violent fits of exercise to atope to his body for those of mental work, all had been well. Had be only eaten more, and drank more freely and mirthfully, it had not been thus." This could was as extreme and exhaustive as the mental work. But both, in different ways, failed to seek or to obtain that quietude which a gen!both have lived more immediately in communion with a wife and children, on a quiet farm, both might have worked as bard and been alive now and happy .- Philadelphia Ledger.
